Well I think you do or else you wouldn't have come here. Snail mail is an application that sends a high quality compressed image of a page you wish to read on a website, with it coming to a small email folder. It's great for saving space on your hard drive and can be used for private use. If you open the application and load an image you can navigate the browser and select the webpage you wish to read. You can save the image to a folder of your choice and read it anytime later, or you can email the images to an address you are on. Even though it's just a page from a website it's an advanced application which I consider it a good one, because it has support for many websites and even webpages in different languages. You can easily make an application like this for yourself, which doesn't require any programming knowledge. With just a little time you can come up with your own custom made image viewer, similar to this one. Some features that make this an exceptional application for private use, are a slow loading speed, high quality compression, browser save, low power consumption and instant email.
